First I need get this out of my system: Topology is so fascinating to me that while poring over the working notebooks on display here I thought to myself “I would really like to date a topologist” and then I thought “wait, I already did that.” People say ~art and science are the same~ all the time but when you get into certain kinds of math, the level people think on, you realize art and science are the same because they’re abstract divinity made real. This compact show does its damndest to bring that profundity into broad daylight too, placing working tools (some in action) in glass tables and plotter-drawn algorithms by Vera Molnár alongside new assemblages by Howardena Pindell. Through March 25.
